Summary
Looks at the history of Hull House, opened by Jane Addams in 1889 as a place where she, Julia Lathrop, and other activists could provide outreach services to the poor and uneducated people of the surrounding Chicago neighborhood. Examines how the reformers applied statistical analysis to real-world problems, particularly infant and maternal mortality, thereby paving the way for far-reaching social reform. Looks at the relationship between social statistics and their objectivity and social policy

Summary

On the 25th anniversary of the first diagnosed cases of AIDS, FRONTLINE examines one of the worst pandemics the world has ever known in "The Age of AIDS." After a quarter century of political denial and [social] stigma, of stunning scientific breakthroughs, bitter policy battles and inadequate prevention campaigns, HIV/AIDS continues to spread rapidly throughout much of the world, particularly in developing nations. In Part One’s two-hour broadcast, "The Age of AIDS" begins with the medical and scientific mystery that emerged in 1981 when five gay men in Los Angeles were diagnosed with a new disease. The film documents the frantic search by American and European scientists and epidemiologists to find the source of the deadly infection as they tracked its spread among gay men, intravenous drug users, and hemophiliacs, and then into the general population. The trail led them back in time, from major American and European cities to Haiti and finally to the Congo. The story then moves from the mysterious virus to the fear, stigma and political controversies during the Reagan administration. Attempts to prevent the spread of the disease, most prevalent among gay men and intravenous drug users at the time, sparked furious public debate. As the film tracks HIV's devastating spread around the world, it documents how some countries—Europe, Africa and Asia—found tools to slow its progress, including needle-exchange programs and massive condom distribution campaigns. Part Two of "The Age of AIDS" begins by exploring the chasm that emerged between rich and poor following the development of the miraculous "triple cocktail" HIV treatment. In the mid-1990s, when doctors discovered the cocktail, it seemed to signal a new era in which AIDS was no longer a fatal disease. But the high price of the drugs meant they were unaffordable to patients in developing nations. "The Age of AIDS" tracks the political struggle to lower those prices, in countries like Brazil, and documents the South African government’s tragic failure to battle the epidemic that was overwhelming its country. The film also examines the next wave of the AIDS epidemic in some of the most populous and strategically important nations in the world, including Russia, India and China, and tracks the same pattern of official denial and political indifference that characterized the epidemic in so many other countries

Abstract: This paper grew out of a dialogue between the authors about the state of children, youth, and child and youth care workers in the world. Both authors had worked to develop professions in North America over a period of several decades. We felt a new politic was needed to frame and lend substance to the diversity of voices, methods, and approaches within the field, and to advance better care for children, youth, and workers. While each of us came at the topic from a different angle, we both agreed that the time to rethink our political engagement in the world and to formulate a new path for action is now. What follows are our 'takes' on how the profession can move ahead on behalf of children, youth, families, and child and youth care workers.

A New Politic in Child and Youth Care

Not all is well in our field; many children and youth are suffering. While this is an obvious statement, it bears reflection. Child and youth care practice, perhaps more so than other fields, has a responsibility to look inward often and critically because many are...

- View Abstract
A meta-analysis of the effects of early developmental prevention programs in at-risk populations on non-health outcomes in adolescence.

Children and Youth Services Review. 32(4) Apr 2010, 506-519.

The authors present the results of a meta-analytic review of early developmental prevention programs (children ages 0-5: structured preschool programs, center-based developmental day care, home visitation, family support services and parental education) delivered to at-risk populations on non-health outcomes during adolescence (educational success, cognitive development, social-emotional development, deviance, social participation, involvement in criminal justice, and family well-being). This review improves on previous meta-analyses because it includes a more comprehensive set of adolescent outcomes, it focuses on measures that are psychometrically valid, and it includes a more detailed analysis of program moderator effects. Seventeen studies, based on eleven interventions (all U.S.-based) met the ten criteria for inclusion into the analysis. The mean effect size across all programs and outcomes was 0.313, equivalent to a 62% higher mean score for an intervention group than for a control group. The largest effect was for educational success during adolescence (effect size 0.53) followed by social deviance (0.48), social participation (0.37), cognitive development (0.34), involvement in criminal justice (0.24), family well-being (0.18), and social-emotional development (0.16). Programs that lasted longer than three years were associated with larger sample means than programs that were longer than one year but shorter than three years. More intense programs (those with more than 500 sessions per participant) also had larger means than less intense programs. There was a marginally significant trend for programs with a follow-through component into the early primary school years (e.g. preschool to Grade 3) to have more positive effects than programs without a follow-through. The authors conclude that the impact of well-conducted early development programs on quality of life in adolescence can be substantial for social policy purposes. (Journal abstract)

The authors present the results of a meta-analytic review of early developmental prevention programs for children ages 3-5: structured preschool programs, center-based developmental day care, home visiting, family support services and parental education delivered to at-risk populations on non-health outcomes during adolescence (educational success, cognitive development, social-emotional development, delinquency, and family well-being). This review improves on previous meta-analyses because it includes a more comprehensive set of adolescent outcomes. It focuses on measures that are psychometrically valid, and it includes a more detailed analysis of program moderator effects. Seventeen studies, based on eleven interventions (all U.S.-based) met the ten criteria for inclusion in the analysis. The mean effect size across all programs and outcomes was 0.31 (equivalent to a 52% higher mean score for an intervention group than for a control group). The largest effect was for educational success during adolescence (effect size 0.53) followed by social deviance (0.48), social participation (0.37), cognitive development (0.14), involvement in criminal justice (0.24), family well-being (0.18), and social-emotional development (0.16). Programs that lasted longer than three years were associated with larger positive means than programs that were longer than one year but shorter than three years. More intensive programs (those with more than 500 sessions per participant) also had larger means than less intensive programs. There was a marginally significant trend for programs with a follow-through component into the early primary school years (e.g., preschool to Grade 3) to have more positive effects than program without a follow-through. The authors conclude that the impact of well-conducted early development programs on quality of life in adolescence can be substantial for social policy purposes. (Journal abstract)

ABSTRACT

We present the results of a meta-analytic review of early developmental prevention programs (children aged 0–5: structured preschool programs, center-based developmental day care, home visitation, family support services and parental education) delivered to at-risk populations on non-health outcomes during adolescence (educational success, cognitive development, social–emotional development, deviance, social participation, involvement in criminal justice, and family well-being). This review improves on previous meta-analyses because it includes a more comprehensive set of adolescent outcomes, it focuses on measures that are psychometrically valid, and it includes a more detailed analysis of program moderator effects. We conclude that the impact of well-conducted early development programs on quality of life in adolescence can be substantial.

Abstract: In the United States, interest in early childhood development has grown dramatically over the past two decades and continues to expand. Increasing public support for programs and services that address the needs of young children and their families provides numerous opportunities for social work intervention. This article describes three major early childhood systems—early intervention, Early Head Start, and early care and education—and discusses ways that social workers can strengthen programs within these systems and improve outcomes for participating children and families. Social workers' understanding of and commitment to family-centered practice and cultural competence are highlighted. Opportunities for social workers to become involved in these programs are also discussed.
